Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine whether the use of a computer-based program designed to teach the concepts of the scientific method would increase students' understanding of the scientific method. A total of 60 students were divided into two groups. One group used the computer-based program, while the other group received traditional instruction. Both groups completed a pre-test and a post-test. The results showed that the computer-based program significantly increased students' understanding of the scientific method compared to traditional instruction.
